The Socialists pushed M. Brisson with the denergy, and prophesied a revolution if M. Casimir-Perier should be elected.

In the lobby an ex-member of M. Dupuy's former Cabinet loudly declared that he would rather lose his right hand than that such an unpolished peasant as Junuy should be elected President.

At 2-45 p. m. the letter "it" was reached, and the canvassing among the Deputies and Senators lulled in anticipation of the result of the vorbing M. He did not wish to see an unreliable mun elected, no matter what his positive and the candidates he preferred M. Arago.

M. Goblet, ex-Cabinet Minister and Radical Socialist, informed the United Press representative that if a second ballot should be found necessary he would insist upon his supporters going over to M. Brisson, in whose Ministry M. Goblet served, and whose success he hoped to insure.

When the name of M. Faberot, Socialist, was called, he exclaimed: "I shall not vote, because I believe another Presidency will kill the Republic."

His great-greatdfather was a notary, living near Grenoble, Maude, a long-headed and enterprising speculator, This worthy left eight sons, the two ier of whom were received into the French peerage, while the third displayed his father's commerdal sagnetty in many fields. It was the fourth of cans, and added: a destined to establish olitical fortunes of the family on a prouder basis than heretofore. He was a man of indomitable energy and strong but honorable ambition; in person a giant, with a voice of thunder, a bitter style of eloquence, and a coarse, even brutal, manner. He played a considerable part in the Opposition after the Restoration, and his policy as President of the Council under Louis Philippe is a matter of history. In 1832 he visited the cholera hospital with the Duc d'Orleans, father of the Comte de Paris, caught the infection and died. The elder of his two sons, Paul by name, still survives as Senator of the Seine inferieure, but he hus never been a prominent personage. Auguste, his younger brother, adopted the baptismal name of his father as part of his surname, and was known as Auguste Casimir-Per er. In 1866 he was returned for one of the divisions of Paris, and in 1849 he represented the Department of the Aube in the Legislative Assembly. During the Empire he held absolutely alouf from public affairs. but in 1871 he gave in his adhesion to M. Thiers, who made him Minister of the Interior. Like his son to-day, he was suspected of leanings toward the Orieanists, for he had married the sister-in-law of the Duc d'Audiffret-Pasquier and received a visit from the Comte de Paris at his country house. However, he cleared himself of these aspersions by a letter in which he frankly avowed his loyalty to the Republic as the only form of Government that could save France from Anarchy. His death took pince in 1876, and his son Jean succeeded to the greater share of both his political reputation and his estate. family still retain possession of the Château de Vizille, a noble feudal structure, built in 1611 by the Constable de Lesdiguières, near the ruins of a still more ancient stronghoid. It was much injured by fire in 1825 and was subsequently restored; but most of its artistle contents perished beyond recovery. M. Thiers was entertained there in 1874, and M. Carnot was a visitor more recently; but the new President chiefly resides, as does his widowed mother, at another mansion, the Château de Pontsur-Selne, much more accessible from Paris.

M. Casimir-Perier was born in Paris, on November 8, 1847, and received a fine classical education. In the war with Germany he distinguished himself as commander of a battallon of Mobiles. He was mentioned in general orders for one daring feat. He rescued one of his wounded comrades under very heavy fire in an affair in front of the redoubt of Moulin Saquet. For this he also received the decoration of the Legion of Honor. In the winter of 1871-2 he served under his father in the Ministry of the Interior, and in 1874 was elected a Deputy from Nogent-sur-Seine. He was re-elected by the same constituency in 1876, and in May, 1877, was one of the 323 Deputies who refused to give the Ministry of the Duc de Broglie a vote of confidence. Dissolution followed, and he was a third time elected to the Chamber I Inder the new Government he was made Under-Secretary for Public Instruction, Worship and Fine Arts. For the fourth time Nogent-sur-Seine sent him to the Chamber in 1881. Soon after a law was passed excluding all the members of the families who had reigned over France from all civil and military offices, and he showed his sense of that law of proscription by resigning his seat as a member of the Chamber. His immediate re-election showed that his constituents approved his conduct. In the fall of 1881 he became Under-Secretary for War. Al the election of October, 1885, he was chosen a Deputy for the Department of Aube, and in Naysut of last year he was again chosen a Deputy by an over later he became Prime Minister. His wise and masterful course at the head of the Cabinet shows what kind of a President he will probably make. Emphatically he is a strong man; his critics say too proud and autocratic. But then they said M. Carnot was cold and unsympathetic. Certainly the President-elect has shown no qualities in public or in private character that would unfit him for being an almost ideal Chief Magistrate. He is a man of great energy, and the fact that he appointed M. Raynal to be his Minister of the Interior shows that he is not to be swayed by the clamor of the Radical and Revolutionary press, as M. Raynal, who belongs to the Jewish faith, is the bete noir of the anti-Semitic and Revolutionary press. Indeed, though he is a thorough Republican, he may properly be regarded as belonging to the Orieanist school of politics, that school which holds that liberty stands in need of the corrective of order, and whose ideal in all things was well expressed by the phrase in fashion in the days of Louis Philippe, the "Juste Milleu". A few weeks ago, early in his campaign for the Presidency of the Republic, his Ministry was defeated, and he resigned; whereupon the Chamber preimptly put him back in his former place as its presiding officer. From that place he is now promoted to the Elysée.

"Italia forever!" Police interference saved the chairman, Joseph Colegaris, from rough handling by the infuriated mob. The meeting was held in Garibaldi Hall, which is in the heart of the Italian quarter. The chairman was forced off the platform, and but for two policemen he might have been killed. The chairman attempted to leave the hall with a policeman in front and one behind him. A way was forced through the excited mass of men as far as the doors, and the excited mass of men as far as the doors, and the two policemen drew their clubs and defended the stairs until Colegaris had reached the lower landing. When Colegaris reached the street the mob, reinforced by hundreds of men, who lined the streets, with a wild yell and without knowing whom they were pursuing, joined in a chase after him. The police made a continuous fight. They kept an open circle about Colegaris along Broadway and Montgomery-st until he had reached the shelter of the Commercial Hotel.

Colegaris and his friends were unable to account for the extraordinary action of the mob. Their idea, however, is that the trouble was due to a division of the Italian colony. The men composing one faction are merchants and capitalists. The first faction is opposed to the second, and is alleged to be permented to some extent by the teachings of the Mafia.
